

To the young children in Botswana their country is a challenge. The bright girls when they leave school want to be properly trained for a job. The boys want to have real skills which they can develop. But it is not easy.

Seloi was a clever girl. She was determined to be a nurse. But her mother could not see the point. Why not get married as other girls did? But Seloi had her way. She did train to be a nurse, and later was in charge of a small clinic right out in the bush.

For Mokgosi it was perhaps even more difficult. He came from a small village in the bush where it was impossible for the children to have proper schooling – a village where many of the elders still believed in the old superstitions. But Mokgosi got a place at the Secondary School many miles away. And when he came home for the holidays and found his favourite little sister very ill, it was he who insisted that she be taken to the new clinic in the bush.

Yet although Seloi and Mokgosi are very anxious to be modern, they are truly African, and they find it difficult to balance their desire for Western knowledge with their pride in being African. In this new book Naomi Mitchison, who understands so well these problems of young people in Africa today, tells a story which will have a meaning for us all, whatever our country.
