Family in the modern society

According to functionalists the family has lost its functions, functionalism claim there is integration and harmony between different parts of society which rely upon each other to maintain a cooperating society. Functionalists view the family as vital organs in maintaining society, functionalism concentrates on the contribution of the family towards society and how the family fits with other social institutions to create an efficient society.

Functionalists like Murdock argues that the family has four main functions; reproduction as the family provides some stability for the reproduction and rearing of children, economic as the family provides for the family in terms of food and shelter, sexual and socialisation. Murdock regards these functions as necessary in any society; he suggests the nuclear family was found in every society however it is not the only form of arrangement that can carry these functions out.

For functionalists the family "fulfils a number of important functions for individuals and society such as the socialisation of children and the stabilisation of adult personalities" Functionalists like Parsons and Dennis argue that in contemporary society many of the functions performed by the family and pre industrialised society has been removed from the family. Many argue that "these functions are being taken over by other institutions" and that these have been transferred to other institutions for example the NHS as well as the education and welfare system.

Parsons refers to this as structural differentiation and he also claimed that this process has meant that modern more specialised families now only have two main basic needs: Primary socialisation of children and stabilisation of adult personalities. However many sociologists argue against claims made by Parsons and Dennis, some argue that the family has not lost its functions. Fletcher and Shorter 1966 deny that the family has lost its functions in contemporary society.

They suggest that during pre industrial and early industrial society poverty meant that functions such as welfare and education were not effectively carried out. Children were often neglected and male peasants didn't care for their wives but more about their animals. Fletcher argues that the family has now more or less fewer functions placed on it for example the health and welfare functions of the family have been strengthened by welfare state and parents now are more preoccupied with their children's health.

Social services with their powers now intervene in family cases if there are reports or suspicions of child neglect and this has increased the responsibilities of parents rather than discouraging them. Feminism however disagrees with the view that the family has lost its economic role of a unit of production and argue that it has
