Vehicles that are used frequently and for long distances will require more frequent maintenance than those that are used infrequently and for short distances. The frequency of use will also determine the type of maintenance required. For example, a vehicle that is used frequently and for long distances will require more frequent oil changes and tire rotations than a vehicle that is used infrequently and for short distances. The type of maintenance required will also depend on the age of the vehicle. Older vehicles will require more frequent maintenance than newer vehicles. Finally, the type of vehicle will also determine the level of maintenance required. For example, a heavy-duty truck will require more frequent maintenance than a passenger car.
