

Security in the 21st Century

NATO's 50th anniversary finds the Alliance in good health. The Washington summit in April 1999 reaffirmed NATO's role as a unique community of interests, values and action. The Alliance has re-shaped both itself and European security after the end of the Cold War. NATO has made partnership and co-operation the operating principles of security. And, by engaging itself in Bosnia and Kosovo, NATO is also addressing those parts of Europe that still have failed to make their full transition. In short, NATO has become a catalyst of a broader co-operative security order.

That NATO could assume this catalytic role is due to the fact that NATO has learned how to cope with change. Indeed, how to manage change in accordance with our values and interests will be the decisive factor determining our security in the coming century. This requires us to realise that security is a broad concept, a pro-active concept and that, for security to last, one must move from safeguarding it to actively promoting it.

21st Century Security Challenges

The 21st century will offer no shortage of challenges. Globalisation, for example, will make our societies more creative and prosperous, but also more vulnerable. The rapid dissemination of technology and information offers entirely new ways of production – but also the spectre of more states developing weapons of mass destruction. Regional conflicts, as Kosovo has forcefully demonstrated, will confront us with a cruel choice between costly indifference and costly engagement. And the scarcity of natural resources will lend projects such as the laying of oil-pipelines or the constructing of dams major economic and political ramifications far beyond the country in which they originate.

Finally, an economic downswing, an environmental disaster or a regional conflict could contribute to turning migration into an entirely new challenge.

The response: A broad concept of security

The breadth and diversity of these challenges can only be addressed properly once we adopt a broad concept of security, a concept that moves beyond military matters alone and includes political, economic and social elements. Only such a broader approach enables us to move beyond dealing with the symptoms only.

In the centre of this broader approach must be the idea of humanity and human rights. A security policy that does not take as its point of reference the need of man and humanity will miss the mark. Indeed, most of the conflicts we see today are between or within states that disregard fundamental human needs. The Kosovo crisis is a case in point. It is thus no accident that the last years have seen an increase in humanitarian actions, beyond the level of the individual nation-state.
