

after the personal control threat, participants rated themselves as more determined to live and act in accordance with their religious beliefs, more willing to denigrate others' religious institutions, more willing to argue for their religious opinions, and even more willing to support religious warfare (McGregor, Hogg, Nash, & Tesser, 2006, Studies 1-2; McGregor, Nash, & Prentice, 2009, Studies 2-3). The same compensatory increase in the volitional elements of religious control resulted in another study that threatened participants' control using the floundering relationship uncertainty threat manipulation described above (McGregor, Nash, & Prentice, 2009, Study 1).

Religious belief may also affirm feelings of volitional personal control via other means. These include vicarious control (Rothbaum et al., 1982), in which the individual identifies and develops feelings of self-other overlap with other powerful sources of control, and God-mediated control, in which the individual feels he or she influences the world indirectly through other powerful sources (e.g., praying; see Krause, 2002).

Epistemic Personal Control. A second form of compensatory personal control, epistemic personal control, refers to the tendency for people to have normative convictions about their ideosyncratic opinions and values and the objectivity and social consensus for those opinions and values (Markus & Miller, 1987). It has long been proposed that beliefs in the objective truth of one's own views and identifying with others who share one's values and goals promote a kind of imperious control that can be an compensating in volitional control (Rothbaum et al., 1982; cf. Nash & Kruglanski, 2006).

Various uncertainty threats cause compensatory epistemic personal control. For example, experimentally manipulated goal conflict (induced by requiring participants to recall over difficult personal differences), mortality salience, and relationship uncertainty threats (induced by having them focus on uncertain relationships) all cause compensatory certainty and consensus about personal opinions and values. Specifically, after these various threats, participants are lists of between 10 and 15 diverse opinions about contentious, value-laden social issues such as capital punishment, abortion, and the U.S. invasion of Iraq and circle the opinion they agree with most. They then rate their certainty, strength, firmness and lack of ambivalence towards their selected opinion and estimate what percentage of the population would agree with their selected opinion. The various threats reliably heighten these markers of epistemic control (McGregor et al., 2003, Studies 1-2; McGregor et al., 2005, Studies 1-2; McGregor & Jordan, 2007; McGregor & Marigold, 2005, Studies 2-3). The extremes of exaggerated epistemic control in such experiments are striking. Participants typically move from having moderately debated certainty and consensus scores to certainty scores averaging 8 out of 10 and consensus estimates approaching 80%. This is despite having just reviewed a list of 10 to 15 opinion options.

As most religions offer a clear interpretation and understanding of the world, along with a community of fellow believers that share this understanding, religious belief likely represents an excellent means of affirming this type of epistemic personal control. Indeed, we have found that participants react to the same psychological threats as described above with exaggerated epistemic control in the form of religious zeal. For example, they claim to be more confident in their religious beliefs, more certain that their religious beliefs are grounded in objective truth, more willing to state that their own religious beliefs are more correct than others' religious beliefs, and more convinced that others would agree with their own religious beliefs if only others would take the time to understand them (McGregor et al., 2008; McGregor, Nash, & Prentice, 2009). These findings are consistent with other later findings that various forms of personal control threat and uncertainty activate cause participants to react with group identity and world-view defense (Fritzsche et al., 2008; Hogg, 2007; van den Bos, in press; cf. Hogg et al., 2006).

Finally, compensatory personal control appears to be specifically mediated by a kind of negative affect related to anxious uncertainty. In several of the studies described above, manipulation checks revealed that feelings related to anxiety and confusion specifically resulted from the threats and in some cases mediated the defining reactions (McGregor et al., 2003; McGregor et al., 2008; McGregor & Marigold, 2005).

Summary

There is considerable new experimental, correlational, and cross-national support for the predictions derived from our compensatory control perspective on motivated religious convictions. Experiments that lower feelings of personal control or lower faith in other sources of external control increase belief in an externally controlling God. This effect is mediated by anxious arousal and is strongest when religious convictions confer order and external control. On the other hand, experiments that lower feelings of personal control also cause people to bolster personal certainty and confidence about compensatory religious convictions, an effect that also appears to specifically arise from anxious uncertainty. The capacity of religion to pursue both external control (religious, social, relational) and personal control (volitional and epistemic) may account for some of its personal appeal.

Preference for Compensatory External Versus Personal Control

Thus, religiosity (both intrinsic and extrinsic; see Allport & Ross, 1967) may be particularly appealing in the face of anxious uncertainty because it can provide both external and

Social Control Of Religious Zeal A Study:

The Social Control of Religious Zeal Jon Miller, 1994 How has the organization of the Christian missionary movement managed to persist for almost two centuries Jon Miller covers the activities of the Evangelical Missionary Society of Basel Switzerland from 1828 to 1918 as it struggled to bring its Pietist religious beliefs to the people of the Gold Coast of West Africa The mission gave different social classes an opportunity to interact in a way that would have been unlikely in Europe Many of the missionaries became socially mobile over the generations through their evangelical work In matters of governance Pietist beliefs called for concentrated power at the center That discipline channeled the zeal of the missionaries but it alienated ordinary members and suppressed their initiative while at the same time allowing creativity among eccentric nonconformists Miller interprets these contradictions explores their consequences at home and abroad and explains how the mission persisted despite the personal pain its members experienced The mission remains active and influential in Africa to this day This study of the passage of an organization through time will interest organizational sociologists sociologists of religion and students of social theory and social change Research in the Social Scientific Study of Religion Ralph L. Piedmont, David O. Introduction to the Sociology of Missions Robert L. Montgomery, 1999-11-30 While much work has been done to apply anthropological insights to the study of missions the sociological perspective has been generally neglected by missiologists This volume defines the sociology of missions as a discrete subdiscipline within the sociology of religion and provides a working set of conceptual resources for those involved in mission work to use in furthering their understanding of their task The author reviews the major areas of sociology that are most relevant to missions and presents his findings as a basis for discussion and a stimulus to further exploration of relevant sociological concepts and theories One of his main goals is to increase dialogue between missiologists and sociologists of religion by providing the former with a sociological perspective and the latter with a deeper understanding of the missionary enterprise

Conflict, Conquest, and Conversion Eleanor Tejirian, Reeva Spector Simon, 2014-10-07 Conflict Conquest and Conversion surveys two thousand years of the Christian missionary enterprise in the Middle East within the context of the region s political evolution Its broad rich narrative follows Christian missions as they interacted with imperial powers and as the momentum of religious change shifted from Christianity to Islam and back adding new dimensions to the history of the region and the nature of the relationship between the Middle East and the West Historians and political scientists increasingly recognize the importance of integrating religion into political analysis and this volume using long neglected sources uniquely advances this effort It surveys Christian missions from the earliest days of Christianity to the present paying particular attention to the role of Christian missions both Protestant and Catholic in shaping the political and economic imperialism of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries Eleanor

H Tejirian and Reeva Spector Simon delineate the ongoing tensions between conversion and the focus on witness and good works within the missionary movement which contributed to the development and spread of nongovernmental organizations Through its conscientious systematic study this volume offers an unparalleled encounter with the social political and economic consequences of such trends
