

Aspects of Social Construction

Topic: Sociology | Words: 670 | Pages: 2

Introduction

During the development of an individual, specific changes occur related to psychological, social, and spiritual aspects. For instance, these changes happen distinctively with different life stages. Based on this, social construction involves an ideology of information within sociology that assesses how people generally acquire their understanding and knowledge regarding the surrounding environments or world. However, over time, people in middle adulthood have displayed different natures of changes regarding social construction. Therefore, such changes have been highlighted within this report, with an in-depth concentration on the relevant data that social workers need to know.

Social construction changes

In the past, social construction related to middle adulthood focused more on stagnation against generativity. For instance, individuals within the category focused their lives on generativity, in that they engaged much in identifying life's obligation of maintaining a social life and contributing to social development through voluntary activities (Hutchison, 2018). In the process, this aspect conflicted with stagnation, which involved the feeling among the middle adults that they lacked enthusiasm and full engagement in participating in voluntary affairs and creating a legacy. However, this has changed through time with the current trend; these individuals focus more on subjective aging. For example, these individuals perceive themselves as younger regarding their actual or chronological age. Consequently, this social construction conflicts with the subjective and actual age.
