THE 1967 PRESIDENT'S CRIME COMMISSION REPORT: ITS IMPACT 25 YEARS LATER

CINCINNATI, OHIO: ANDERSON

The blue-ribbon commission to study complex social problems has been a common element of American political history. In the early 1930s, the Wickersham Commission conducted one of the first national surveys of criminal justice administration. Thirty years later, President Lyndon Johnson established the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice.

President Johnson had many reasons for establishing the Crime Commission in 1965: rising crime rates and the fear of crime, increasing social disorders and riots related to the Vietnam War protests and civil rights movements, and increasing pressures from conservatives to address the crime issue. Presidential candidate Barry Goldwater had pummeled Johnson with concerns over the escalating "crime in the streets". Johnson had no good answers and did what was usual for presidents: he established a commission to help him find answers.

The result of this Commission was the publication in 1967 of several large volumes of Task Force Reports. A recent book - The 1967 President's Crime Commission Report: Its Impact 25 Years Later, edited by John A. Conley - assesses the various components of the final report.

Except for a few notable exceptions, the report was "profoundly flawed by unrealistic policies and misinterpretations of the crime problem and public sentiment." "There is no evidence," concludes Professor Stan Stejkovic in his essay on corrections, "that the recommendations of the Commission had any impact on crime."

Of particular interest to readers of The Police Journal is the Task Force Report on the Police. The Commission began its work in the midst of a grave national crisis over the police. The 1964 presidential election raised the "law and order" issue by both parties over several elements: controversial Supreme Court decisions upholding the rights of criminal suspects; a dramatic increase in violent crime; the civil rights movement which raised the issue of discriminatory law enforcement; and a series of urban riots that began in the summer of 1964 and continued through mid-1968.

These factors focused national attention on the urban police officer who, in the words of Professor Samuel Walker, "became a convenient symbol of the country's ills." Many of the Commission's recommendations were consistent with reform proposals that had been promoted for the
