

The third way of understanding the sentence is metaphysical. Secunde the conditions it (essentially) concern the way the thing described by the sentence is and not the relations that exist between it, considered as an intention, and other intentions, or the conditions of knowing it. (That nationality and animality in this context are not taken either as the intentions into which the intention of "human being" is to be analysed or as conditions of our knowing human beings at least, then as

As it is clear from the above, the conditions necessary for the conditions identified in each of these three ways of understanding the sentence in question to be different. It is possible for them to be, in fact, the same. For example: the reason why a human being is a human being and why we know a human being is a human being may be the same: namely, that a human being is rational and animal. But they do not need to be so. Consider another example: It is possible that the conditions we use to know that something is a fish (epistemological understanding) and what makes something a fish (ontological understanding) are not the same. The reason is that such conditions, which are all criteria, are always related to particular observers and their circumstances. Someone who lives in a place where the only animals that swim are fish could very well use swimming as a criterion.
