ABSTRACT:

Background: African-based care has been widely reported that every few studies have done about the effectiveness of home-based care strategies of the elderly in sub-Saharan Africa, particularly DRC. Congo. An effective home-based care has the potential to improve the health system dependency with the involvement of the care and their families.

Method: Mixed-method approach it was used in this study which integrated both quantitative and qualitative methods. 21 elderly people from 17 and above were sampled for the RMT interview and 7 participants were interviewed with 7 participants each.

Results: Relationship of the respondents were amongst each living with their families or live alone with no other care of others and others alone. Moreover, most of the respondents they stated never had no family members after their parents died. The elderly people were often getting financial support from other family members because they have financial support from the government.

Conclusion: Home-based care is an important aspect in the life satisfaction of the elderly. Life satisfaction of the elderly was linked to emotional, physical, spiritual, social and psychological support from family members alongside other medical conditions and their economic status.

Keywords: elderly people, family members, African-based care, life satisfaction.

1. INTRODUCTION

With increased in populations, the number of people aged 65 years and over is constantly increasing and life expectancy is rising with the medical care and technology (Baker et al., 2013). Moreover, this is not without raising a certain number of questions in terms of support for the elderly. An increase in the number of elderly people increases the number of dependent elderly people and their disease, at the very least, in the age of today. However, this tends to rely on the institution of home maintenance and support services are available in the elderly (Gubrium et al., 2002).

This should be the major concern of the population of Africa in light of their extensive consequences and this calls for policy formulation and adjustments to meet this challenge. An increase in the elderly population means that health services need to be improved to support and assist for their needs. Contrary to the popular assumption that the elderly is a burden on the society, in the African setting, they play an important role in shaping and providing their children for education and health care and they are still the caregivers of the younger family members, especially those that are disabled or abandoned.

Other than that, they also play an important role in the economic setting as they usually take up small-scale business in the rural areas due to urbanization and migration to the urban areas by the younger people (PuligatlaMuthanna, 2011).

However, their physical and economic capabilities largely depend on their physical capacity because when their health deteriorate with they require care in return, the family members will need to take up the role
