Robust Small Area Estimation Jiming Jiang,J. Sunil Rao,2025-08-20 In recent years there has been substantial and growing interest in small area estimation SAE that is largely driven by practical demands Here the term small area typically refers to a subpopulation or domain of interest for which a reliable direct estimate based only on the domain specific sample cannot be produced due to small sample size in the domain Keywords in SAE are borrowing strength Because there are insufficient samples from the small areas to produce reliable direct estimates statistical methods are sought to utilize other sources of information to do better than the direct estimates A typical way of borrowing strength is via statistical modelling On the other hand there is no free lunch Yes one can do better by borrowing strength but there is a cost This is the main topic discussed in this text Features A comprehensive account of methods applications as well as some open problems related to robust SAE Methods illustrated by worked examples and case studies using real data Discusses some advanced topics including benchmarking Bayesian approaches machine learning methods missing data and classified mixed model prediction Supplemented with code and data via a website Robust Small Area Estimation Methods Applications and Open Problems is primarily aimed at researchers and graduate students of statistics and data science and would also be suitable for geography and survey methodology researchers The practical approach should help persuade practitioners such as those in government agencies to more readily adopt robust SAE methods It could be used to teach a graduate level course to students with a background in mathematical statistics
