Edmund Burkes Speech on Conciliation with the Colonies

Edmund Burke's ideology about the existence of state for the people is evidently present during his speech about conciliation about the Colonies. Burke believes that the state should work for the people and not for the people to work for the state (Auerbach, 1959, p. 57). Corruption on the side of the state blinded the opportunity for the government to work and play its role.

Political crisis involving colonies encourage Burke to pursue his principles and philosophical spirit about governance. Burke demonstrates that the power of democracy is in the great hands of the masses which also as great as the threat brought by hands of a dictator leader. There are two parties, the left and right which are present for every issue which divides the state and the governance (Bork, 1997, p. 353).

Men by nature will always seek advantage over one another. Thus, the state needs to safeguard inequalities that may arise. The differences in each side must not be overstated nor must it be discounted. Heeding the cry of those who are against the state will create a more terrible sight that later will confront mankind. Each state has established their laws which govern its people and the state. Giving more importance with civil rights that protects the public from being harass or maltreated, this instrument of justice must embody full fairness and impartiality among men.

Burke implies that a single man can make a change for the good cause of all. He must be alone in his dogma but he doesn't care, all he wants is to open the eyes of the people ruling the state. He doesn't need any kind of sympathy but he is counting on his voice to reach the concerned English men.

People will always seek liberty in all aspect of his or her life. Give importance with the freedom of the people, and they will cuddle the government (White, 2002, p. 62). Responsible governance is all that it takes to create a harmonious relationship of men and the government. The more freedom the state gives to its people, the more they will respect the former.

Democracy has its own toll when implemented among men. The political system must realize that the power of the masses has a potential to struggle and fight back against false dichotomy. During Burke's time, the doctrine of good governance requires a mounting courage in pronouncing its true essence especially in a public location. No wonder, Burke had his way out of the league spending most of his years in accomplishing an impeachment against the Governor-General of India.

Corruption upon alliance of states grew much faster allowing extended term in the office and it killed the fundamental nature of the existence of the English statesmanship. Dependence of each Colony from any f
