Tree health in South Africa: Retrospect and prospect

South Africa is a country with very limited natural forest cover. Consequently, the timber and fibre needs of the country cannot be provided for from indigenous forest. It is largely for this reason that South Africa initially developed a highly productive plantation forest industry, which today makes a substantial contribution to the local economy. These plantations are based on non-native species of Eucalyptus, Pinus and Australian Acacia. In the early years of establishment, South African plantations were relatively free of pest and pathogen problems. But, over time, an increasing number of insects, fungi and bacteria have emerged as serious threats to the sustainability of the forestry industry. Numerous native pests and pathogens, especially insects, have adapted to these introduced tree species to cause damage or disease. The problem is compounded by the accidental introduction of non-native pests and pathogens, and this has been at a rapidly increasing rate over the past three decades. Some of these introduced pests and pathogens also threaten the fitness and even the survival of many indigenous South African tree species. Fortunately, South Africa has developed an impressive knowledge base and range of integrated management options to deal with these problems. This development was first driven by government programmes, and in more recent years by public-private partnerships between industry, universities and government. It is clear from the pattern of emergence of pests and pathogens in recent years that South Africa will deal with an increasing number of these problems and a continuously changing tree health environment. This requires robust investment in both quarantine and mitigation mechanisms to protect the country's biodiversity as well as to ensure the sustainability of its wood and fibre industries.

Significance:

- This review about tree health in South Africa was in part inspired by the 2020 International Year of Plant Health. Plant health, and particularly tree health, is an important topic in regard to the sustainability of our forestry industry and conservation of our native forests. South Africa has been a leader in the field and this review highlights some of the achievements that researchers in the country, both past and present, have attained.

Introduction

South Africa is an arid country and consequently has very limited resources of natural forest in the western part of the country. This is the primary reason why South Africa was one of the first countries in the world to establish commercial plantation forestry based on non-native tree species. These plantations were able to accommodate local demand for wood products, especially for construction and fuelwood. In the process, this allowed small tracts of natural forest and woody ecosystems to be spared from destruction.¹

The first commercial plantations established in South Africa were those of Pinus pinaster (around 1825), soon overtaken by P. radiata and much later by P. patula. Likewise, Eucalyptus was an early addition to the exotic tree resource with the first planting of Eucalyptus globulus in 1887. Subsequently, commercial forestry has grown considerably in South Africa based mainly on Pinus and Eucalyptus, but also including Australian Acacia species, mainly Acacia mangium. According to Forestry South Africa, as of February 2020, the current landholding representing commercial plantation forestry in South Africa is approximately 1.2 million hectares.

Many factors affect the health of trees. These factors include damage by insect and nematode pests and pathogens such as bacteria, fungi and viruses. Climatic factors such as rainfall, temperature and wind, as well as edaphic factors including soil structure and quality, are all important contributors to the overall health and vigour of trees. For the purpose of this review, we deal exclusively with pests and pathogens – thus broadly the fields of forest entomology and forest pathology as they relate to the health of forest trees in South Africa.

When considering forest tree health in South Africa, it is important to clearly distinguish between trees in natural woody ecosystems and those that are planted commercially. These are very different situations, both in terms of the impact and the management of insect pests and pathogens. Plantations, especially in the southern hemisphere, typically comprise non-native tree species often planted in high-density monocultures that are intensively managed. The choice of species, provenance or genotype is carefully controlled, and typically tailored to particular regions and sites based on numerous biotic and abiotic conditions as well as risk factors. Natural forest and woody ecosystems in South Africa are biodiverse and composed of large numbers of native trees and other plants in a complex matrix, and are typically protected from logging. In contrast, plantations are managed mainly by commercial enterprises and are of high value. Among other factors, this dichotomy leads to different approaches to managing pests and pathogens, although significant tree health challenges exist in both commercial and non-commercial woody ecosystems.

In plantations, serious damage due to pests and pathogens is usually very obvious and is considered important and worthy of intervention. In contrast, disease and pest problems in natural forests have been afforded very little attention in South Africa in the past. The value of understanding and managing health risks in natural forests has changed in recent years, due in part to the recognition of bidirectional transfer of pests and pathogens between native and non-native plantation systems, and the resulting substantial impacts on trees grown as non-natives in plantations.^{2,3} Thus, the establishment of the South African Department of Science and Innovation (DSI) and
