1. INTRODUCTION

Strategic sufficiency aims to protect the natural foundations, as it relates to strategies through which materials can be provided, by changing people's behavior, or at least as a result of using less raw materials, as well as a new understanding of prosperity and well-being about a shifting relationship with commodities, production, and consumption. It is appropriate for business and a fundamental strategy for achieving sustainability (Linz, 2006: 7). The objective of strategic sufficiency is the absolute reduction of resource consumption, and strategies such as purchase reduction, modular adjustments, and product longevity are employed to achieve this objective. Increasingly, some external organizations advocate sufficiency-oriented consumption through marketing (Gossen & Kropf, 2022:720). According to (Gunarathne & Ki-Hoon Lee, 2021:1), the objective of strategic sufficiency is to improve the use of resources in an organization's operations to increase productivity, to replace environmentally harmful resources with greener ones, and to reduce resource consumption by eliminating or reducing the need for the organization to use resources. Strategic sufficiency, according to (Figge et al., 2014:217), seeks to reduce environmental pressures caused by resource consumption and accomplish greater sustainability through the optimal use of resources. Pro-environmental behavior (PEB) refers to deliberate actions performed by individuals to protect and preserve the natural world. An individual's pro-environmental behavior comprises voluntary or recommended actions intended to preserve the natural environment. Pro-environmental behavior consists of individual actions that contribute to environmental sustainability and can be exercised at home or in the workplace (Fatooki, 2019:3). Environmentally responsible behavior in the workplace can also be defined as actions taken by employees and management to enhance the natural environment. When employees implement environmentally sustainable behaviors in the workplace, this is referred to as green or pro-environment employee behavior. Kim and Thapa (2018:31) define pro-environmental employee behavior as the voluntary actions and behaviors that employees engage
