The Effectiveness of Employee Assistance Programs in Reducing Stress in the Occupational Environment Mark Richard Linke, 1993 This paper explores the effectiveness of employee assistance programs as a strategy to reduce occupational stress from the viewpoint of the occupational health and safety practitioner This is achieved by first looking at the nature of stress and its causes from a work perspective followed by its effect on the employee and the employer There are a number of strategies that can be used to manage stress in the workplace one such strategy the Employee Assistance Program is examined in detail along with other methods including human resource management practices such as matching the person to the job improved communication practices which the author concludes are equally important as implementing an Employee Assistance Program if stress is to be reduced in the workplace Methods of evaluating an Employee Assistance Program to determine their effectiveness or otherwise are also discussed with doubts being cast on the reliability of standard indicators such as absenteeism and workers compensation claims A case study on the implementation of an Employee Assistance Program within a Local Government Authority is also discussed including the manner in which the EAP is evaluated by the organisation The paper concludes that it is difficult to attribute any reduction in stress or improvement in morale to the Employee Assistance Program alone as many other variables including human resource management practices can also have an impact in this area Indeed many of the benefits are intangible However from discussions with EAP providers and the organisations they serve where an EAP is tailored to suit an organisation and the issues within it and is adequately communicated to staff then it is likely to have an effect on stress reduction provided the organisational issues that need to be addressed are done so by the employer Abstract
