Tennessee Constitutional Convention of 1870

In 1870, Tennessee held a Constitutional Convention to make new rules for the state. This was an important time because the Civil War had ended, and Tennessee needed to rebuild. The decisions made at the convention shaped the state for years to come, especially in areas like voting, segregation, and public education.

Post Taxes

One big change from the constitution was the creation of poll taxes. A poll tax was a fee people had to pay to vote. While it might seem small, it was hard for many poor people, especially African Americans, to afford. Because of this rule, many people were unable to vote, which gave more power to wealthy white citizens.

Segregation

The convention also made laws that supported segregation. Segregation means separating people based on their race. African Americans and white people had different schools, buses, and even water fountains. The facilities for African Americans were usually much worse than those for white people. These laws were known as "Jim Crow" laws.

Public Education

Another decision made at the convention was to set up a system of public schools. This meant that schools would be funded by the state government instead of just the local area. While this was a good step forward, it was hard because many poor areas had fewer resources than other parts of the state. African American students had to get the same quality of education.

The Tennessee Constitutional Convention of 1870 had both good and bad effects. It helped create public schools, but it also supported segregation and made it harder for many people to vote. These decisions shaped how Tennessee has changed over time.
