

staff and collaborators. The old-timers felt hurt and browbeaten upon the newcomers, not realising that they were taking the same jealous attitude which they had criticised in Diaghilev. All this caused much painful discord and prolonged ruptures. Fortunately they did not last forever.

Diaghilev knew how to create round him amazing activity and an artistic atmosphere that was like an electric current which stimulated all his associates into work, sharpened their fantasy, and made any task seem worth doing. One forgot effort and fatigue. Carried away by this fever of work, one became intoxicated with the sense of participation in a creation pure and disinterested.

As a result those among Diaghilev's co-workers who had left him dramatically would always feel a nostalgia for his laboratory, for that perpetually boiling cauldron of work, and fascinated by its irresistible charm — forgetting griefs and grievances — they were always ready to return. As for Diaghilev, although his fits of temper could be terrible for the moment, he never held a grudge, and when his friends and artists returned to him, he always took them back as if nothing had ever occurred.

He loved music passionately and understood it very well. But his tastes varied and did not always agree with mine. He had certain preferences to which he always remained inwardly faithful, but sometimes he sacrificed them for the sake of opportunity. For instance, he did not dare for a long time to produce Tchaikovsky's ballets, although he adored his music, merely because the supposedly advanced set in Paris — which, he felt, had to be considered — held that composer, for reasons still mysterious to me, in disgrace and contempt. But he never made any concessions to the so-called great public. On the contrary, it often gave him pleasure to amuse and shock them.

If one were to ask me what music impressed him the most, I would say, without speaking of my own (the number of my works he produced speaks for itself), that he loved best old Italian music and that of Gounod and Tchaikovsky. It was with real joy that he used to study in the libraries — especially in Italy — old scores and manuscripts of Pergolesi, Donizetti, Scarlatti, and Cimarosa. What a thrill it was for him when he discovered in Cimarosa's Le Associe Femminili a dance divertissement with Russian motifs entitled Balla Russa! This was because Cimarosa had been for many years Master of the Chapel at the court of Catherine II. Diaghilev produced this opera in its entirety, later only giving one act, which he called Cimarosiana.

He became enthusiastic over Gounod when we went together to several performances of the opera Philémon et Baucis, which was produced in 1925 at the Théâtre du Trion Lyrique in Paris. This gave him the idea of going back to the fane this delightful composer. Diaghilev did research among Gounod's forgotten works and I still remember with what delight he listened to Le Mèdein Malgré Lui, which he found and which I played to him with as much pleasure as he had in hearing it. The following year he produced with great care these two operas in Monte Carlo, but his dream of a Gounod "revival" failed in the face of an indifferent and smotherish public who did not dare applaud the music of a composer not accepted by the aristocrate.

The time that I saw Diaghilev the most enthusiastic was when — feeling that the moment had at last arrived when he could give to the public a composer whom he had never ceased to love — he produced in London, with unprecedented splendor, Tchaikovsky's ballet The Sleeping Princess. I never saw him work with such ardor and love! After long and painstaking preparation, in which I also took an active part, the ballet was finally produced with a brilliant cast, including the most celebrated stars of the Imperial Ballet, and with magnificent sets and costumes designed by Bakst. But a catastrophe took place. At the end of the second act when the actors were meant to sleep, an enchanted forest, with trees and foliage, was supposed to rise slowly out of the ground to hide the background. In St. Petersburg this was wonderfully arranged, thanks to the perfect machinery and competent stagehands. At the Alhambra in London, however, all the equipment was much more primitive. So, at the beginning of this scene, the audience suddenly heard a great cracking noise, the machinery stopped working, and the end of the set was completely ruined.

This unhappy occurrence no doubt contributed to the lack of success of the performance. Diaghilev was in despair. That night, probably because he had worked so hard and used so much vitality, he had a nervous breakdown. He sobbed like a child and all of us around him had difficulty calming him. With his usual superstition, he saw in this incident a bad omen and seemed to lose all confidence in his new creation, to which he had given so much of his soul and energy.

DIAGHILEV loved splendor, sumptuousness, and brilliance. He loved to do things in the grand manner. Unfortunately he never had adequate means to satisfy his tastes. How happy he was whenever he did have sufficient money! He had extreme pleasure in organizing a grandiose pageant in the palace at Versailles in the summer of 1929. A committee was formed in Paris to arrange a series of festivals in Versailles. Diaghilev was given the necessary funds to provide a spectacle in the chateau's celebrated Gallery of Mirrors to depict the court of Louis XIV. He immediately started work, building at one end a stage made almost entirely of mirrors. Even the staircases leading to it on both sides had steps made of mirrors. Diaghilev composed a magnificent program of dances and songs. Every performer was
