

How To Identify Stress in a Child

First identify if an issue is present, then work to resolve

Stress can be just as harmful for children as adults. Since preschoolers don't articulate their emotions well, spotting anxiety in kids and how stress appears is the first step to eliminating it.

Recognizing Stress Symptoms

Abnormal conduct and changes in appetite or sleep can be signs of a stressed out kid. At this age, variations in behavior and eating habits are fairly common. But in cases that include emotional outbursts or social withdrawal, the child may be experiencing effects of stress with no way to express it. Frequent or inconsolable crying is one of the signs of stress in babies and toddlers.

Separation anxiety is a common form of childhood stress. It can manifest as apprehension during day-care drop-offs, when mom and dad are gone for hours. At home, a child might avoid bedtime or act out out of a fear of being alone and alienated from parents.

Habits like thumb sucking or hair twirling are normal for babies and toddlers. However, by preschool these activities are often coping techniques for nervousness and high stress levels.

Several things can trigger this reaction to stress, including normal daily events like training and moving to a big kid bed are major life events that impact a child's schedule and independence. Other factors that can prompt anxious behavior are parental divorce, parental stress, and relationship traumas (changes in living situation or number of adults in the home).

Tips to Reduce Stress for Kids

Of course, we can't predict every aspect of our schedule or what life has in store down the road. Still, there are a few things you can do to minimize factors that can cause stress for your child.

1

Maintain a predictable schedule with rest periods that they can rely on. Sleep and mental health are important. Kids will do better if a day's expectations are met and they have time to wind down.

2

Talk about major changes like toilet training, or the first day of preschool ahead of time so they're excited to try it when the big day arrives.

When possible, restrict exposure to conflict within the home. Parents and siblings inevitably have arguments and what toddlers don't understand. Limiting what they see and hear avoids unnecessary anxiety.

Above all else, kids thrive in structured, predictable environments where they feel secure and loved. The greatest thing you can do to reduce stress for your child is watch their behavior. Vigilant observation will give you the best chance of identifying the cause of their stress.
