Stress reduction theory – Roger S. Ulrich

Roger Ulrich's Stress Reduction Theory (SRT) provides a detailed and logically consistent explanation for why nature exposure can be expected to reduce psychological and physiological stress, enhance cognitive functioning or performance, and promote improved health outcomes. The theory generates several testable hypotheses and has the important strength of establishing tight direct links between theoretical arguments and objective psycho-physiological measures of stress and restoration. SRT emerged from Ulrich's psycho-evolutionary theory (1983) which postulates that immediate, unconsciously triggered and initiated affective responses – not 'controlled' cognitive responses – play a central role in the initial level of responding to nature, and have major influences on physiological responding, attention/intake, and conscious processing. A basic argument is that this multimodal process of responding quickly motivates adaptive behavior. The emphasis on affect was informed in part by Ulrich's early empirical finding (1979) that stressed that people assigned to view nature settings evidenced a much larger increase in positive affect and greater reductions in negative emotions (fear, anger) than those who viewed urban scenes. SRT holds that people benefit most from encounters with nature when they are stressed, but even unstressed people evidence more positive responding to nature than environments lacking nature (Ulrich, 1983). The theory tends to use the terms 'stress recovery' and 'restoration' interchangeably, although restoration is interpreted as a broader term that can also apply to recuperation from understimulation and boredom.

As a carryover from evolution, modern humans have a highly developed capacity for responding with stress and physiological mobilization to demanding or threatening situations. SRT maintains that the immediate benefits for early humans of stress responding and adaptive behavior when encountering challenging situations or sudden threats could be great (survival), but they came with costly effects such as energy-draining physiological mobilization and strongly negative emotions (fear, anger). If a threat or challenging situation were resolved, and an individual then encountered a natural setting favorable to ongoing well-being or survival, SRT proposes that the adaptive need would be for recuperation or a 'breather' from stress.
