

The Legal Profession

Introduction

The legal profession is generally perceived to be very old-fashioned. This view is perhaps not surprising if we consider judges' and lawyers' clothing, the formalised split nature of the profession (advocates and attorneys, which we learn about later in the chapter), how we refer to presiding officers (using 'My Lady' or 'Your Worship'), and the general use of language (for example, 'as the court pleases'). The profession is intertwined with a formal process. As such it is based on English legal tradition. The legal system experienced a legitimacy crisis during the late 1980s. One reason for this was the dominance of white males in the legal profession. The profession to date is criticised for its white male dominance and for its inability to provide legal services to those who need it the most, in other words, people who cannot afford private legal services. At present, the profession is in a process of restructuring and change. One of the primary manners in which the restructuring and change is taking place is the passing of the Legal Practice Act 28 of 2014. The Legal Practice Act came into full effect on 1 November 2018 and the purpose of the Act is to ensure that access to legal services becomes a reality for all, and not only for a few wealthy people.

South African universities have historically offered the following law degrees to qualify people for the different legal professions:

- BLuris (three years), for public prosecutors and magistrates;
- BProc (four years), for attorneys;
- LLB (five years), for all legal professions.

These degrees have now been abolished and have been replaced with a four-year LLB degree. The four-year LLB is offered at all South African universities and may be used to access all the legal professions discussed below.

14.1 Traditional careers in the private sector

Traditionally lawyers have pursued two professions in South Africa: attorney and advocate.
