THE TRANS-SIBERIA RAILWAY

The Trans-Siberian Railway is the longest single rail system in Russia, stretching from Moscow to the port of Vladivostok. The railway has had great importance in the economic, military, and imperial history of the Russian Empire and the Soviet Union.

Czar Alexander III spearheaded the construction of the railway beginning in 1891 and proceeded to simultaneously build several sections. These sections included the western portion (Moscow), the eastern portion (Vladivostok), the Trans-Siberian Railway, the Transcaspian Railway, and other lines. Originally, in the east, the Russians wanted China's permission to build a line directly across Manchuria (the Chinese Eastern Railway) from the Transcaspian region to Vladivostok; this project was completed in 1901. After the Russo-Japanese War, however, Russia forced Japan's possible takeover of Manchuria and proceeded to build a longer and more difficult alternative route, which was the Amur Railway section.

The completion of the railway marked a turning point in the history of Siberia as it opened up the region for settlement and industrialization. Over the years, a number of additional lines have been built, branching off from the main Trans-Siberian line. From 1974 to 1989 construction was completed on the large alternative route referred to as the Balkan-Amur Railway. This route runs across areas of the Russian Far East.
