

Predictors of attrition-what makes students stay?

- While predictors of attrition may be linked to student satisfaction there may be more to be discovered looking at indicators of student persistence, and subsequent completion (Holder, 2007).
- Economic, organisational, psychological and societal influences have been identified in the research literature as key factors in student withdrawal from their undergraduate programme of study (Nora et al., 1996; Ramos et al., 2015).
- Mature students add complexity to student satisfaction. Failure to integrate into the university system, and adult learning theories are two areas that have received attention in the literature in an attempt to explain high levels of attrition among this cohort (Kenner and Weinerman, 2011; Park and Choi, 2009).
- The growth of online education in universities has resulted in an increase in enrolment but little attention has been placed on retaining students studying online (Gazza and Hunker, 2014).
