This is a study of the interface between power and politeness as manifested in verbal disagreements. It begins with a number of chapters devoted to a discussion of the key concepts that define the author's theoretical conceptualization of social interaction. These concepts are power, communication, relational work, and politeness. The author then applies the model to four (transcribed) interactions. The first, and most extensively analyzed, is a dinner conversation among friends and acquaintances. The second is an organizational meeting in a physics laboratory. The final two come from official transcripts of a radio interview of President Clinton and Supreme Court proceedings relating to the vote count in the U.S. presidential elections of 2000. Common to them all, in the author's view, are instances of disagreement.

Theoretically, interactants are understood to engage in two broad functional types of discourse: transactional and interactional. The former is defined as "optimally efficient transmission of information," and the latter aims at the "establishment and maintenance of social relationships" (pp. 50–51). These discourse types are understood to overlap functionally, and their overall meanings are interpreted through a process of "contextualization." Committed in general to a theory of the culturally constructed nature of social "reality" (45), the author embeds interactants in a complex web of sociocultural constructs. She thus locates the interactants' contextualization efforts at the intersection of event frames and norms. These are understood to incorporate knowledge of the "what, where and when" of event types as well as cultural knowledge, both conscious and unconscious, about social identities, gender, speaking styles, history, and the unfolding interactional context itself (57). Contextualization thus takes place when interactants judge behavior against this cultural world of frames and norms and classify it as particular kinds of events that are, more broadly speaking, negative or positive, marked or unmarked, and appropriate or inappropriate (48).

In addition to this general list of contextualizing influences, the author also, and somewhat problematically, relies on more familiar academic ideological constructs. In the constant struggle between providing information and negotiating
