

FILM SCRIPT

This is an example of a film script. What you are reading now is known as "action description" which describes what is going on in the scene visually.

This stretches across the width of the page, unlike dialogue. Action description should be broken into small bits, 3-5 lines in length.

Keep things like "close-up" and "long shot" out of the script. The script is about the story and the story alone! The director and his crew will decide how the story will be told in the most visually effective manner.

CHARACTER

My name is Character, and I am speaking dialogue!

NEW CHARACTER

(angry)

I'm speaking dialogue, too, and I'm angry! Directions like the one above should be kept to a minimum. These parentheticals can be used to signify emotion (angry), for clarification (to Jennifer), or to describe short actions that would not necessitate an entire action description (fidgeting).

Here's some more action! The Inciting Incident (a.k.a. the "Major Dramatic Question") should be established early.

The Inciting Incident is why you're writing the script; it's what the film is trying to resolve ("Will Dorothy get home?" in The Wizard of Oz, for example).
