Abstract

This paper focuses on contemporary Arab architecture from three main angles; First it explores the extent to which previous research and studies dealt rigorously with the symbolism of physical form(s) in Islamic architecture. Second it turns to the problematic issue of form versus function in design that is the centre of debate and criticism as far as contemporary Arab architects' attempts are concerned. Third, and more precisely, it looks closely at the theoretical framework of two contemporary Arab architects, Hassan Fathy and Rasem Badran.

The scope of the research is limited to the available literature review available in the record first on the so called 'Islamic' Architecture, which this paper argues it is a pre-requisite to understand contemporary Arab Architecture for its vital influence on architects. The methodology of this paper is to review, analyze, and discuss various arguments to establish certain standing points for further research. The aim of the preview is to focus on the vernacular, space, form versus function for further research to understand the way contemporary architects may approach design issues.

1. Introduction

Two main conclusions can be derived from the paper (Tradition versus Modernity: From Cultural Discourse to Architectural Crisis (Al Sayyed, 2011). First, studies on the controversial 'Islamic architecture' often depicted a monumental architecture while ignoring the vernacular side that relates to the majority, hence mistaking the special for the general. Second, the use of such a broad term has provoked a series of questions that put the forms often used under so much scrutiny, eventually leading to a major review to main concepts as far as tradition and modernity or Islamic architecture are concerned. This provoked many questions such as: what determines whether or not this form is 'Islamic'? Or: What makes it legitimate to use this 'Islamic' form in contemporary architects' designs, even when the urban, regional, or trans-regional context is believed to be different?

The questions, notably, bring to the front stage two main themes that will form the centre of this paper and the opens up the door for further investigation; the form versus function and the vernacular architecture. The first is a problematic issue that haunted theoreticians in architecture in general for ages; an issue that either throws architects to this stylistic approach or that if they favour the form over the function, or makes them obsessed with the function as the generator of building form. However, both approaches were subjected to sufficient debate and criticism, and it was not until recently that theories began to point to a third factor in this dual, which is often defined as an
