

Tectonic events responsible for Britain's oil and gas reserves: a summary

B. VAN HOORN

Shell Internationale Petroleum Mij. B.V., P.O. Box 162, 2501 AN The Hague, The Netherlands

In 1964, following the implementation of the 'Continental Shelf Act', the first offshore licenses in the United Kingdom were awarded. Subsequent exploration activities have resulted in the discovery of some 20 billion barrels of oil reserves and 70 trillion cubic feet of recoverable gas, most of which are located in the North Sea Basin. It is no surprise, therefore, that most of the papers presented in this volume concentrate on this area, where a particular and favourable tectonic evolution has led to the coincidence of good source rocks, sufficiently deeply buried; good reservoir development; and timely trap formation in relation to hydrocarbon generation and migration. It is the purpose of this contribution to summarize the various tectonic phases which have contributed to the complex geological evolution of the British Isles and surrounding territorial waters and trace their impact upon the development of the hydrocarbon habitat.

Caledonian framework

The basic tectonic framework of NW Europe was created during Ordovician-early Devonian times, as a result of the closure of the Iapetus Ocean. Whereas in Norway this led to a NW-SE directed collision between the Laurentian and Fennoscandian Shields, in Britain a more complex accretion of Precambrian continental blocks and island arcs onto the N American craton occurred (Coward). The resulting heterogeneity of this basement complex had a critical influence on subsequent tectonic episodes, during which existing basement lineaments were reactivated to varying degrees. In the Northern North Sea and the Atlantic Margin west of the Shetlands, there is an important SW-NE structural grain, reflecting reactivation of Caledonian thrusts. In the Central and Southern North Sea, the predominant NW-SE lineaments probably are related to a diffuse transform zone between the Fennoscandian Shield and accreted terrains.

Devono-Carboniferous

During the Devonian the post-orogenic collapse of the Caledonides was accompanied by a major sinistral translation between the Laurentian and Fennoscandian Shields. In the Northern North Sea these movements gave rise to the rapid subsidence of pull-apart basins (Midland Valley, Orcadian Basin) in which thousands of metres of Old Red Sandstone accumulated, locally providing lacustrine conditions with consequent deposition of organic-rich clays. The early Carboniferous evolution of the British Isles was governed by north-south extension along a series of NW-SE and NE-SW trending faults located along zones of Caledonian weakness (Northumberland, Stainmore, Craven, Gainsborough and Widmerpool Gulf Basins). From the Namurian onwards, crustal stretching ceased and broad regional subsidence was initiated, coincident with a major climatic change from semi-arid to monsoonal conditions. This resulted in the development of major south to southwest directed deltaic drainage systems with extensive coal deposition, forming both excellent gas-prone source rocks and potential reservoirs (Leeder & Hardman, Fraser & Gawthorpe).

Variscan orogeny

As a result of the closure of the Proto-Tethyan Ocean south of Britain and the subsequent collision of Laurasia and Gondwana, intra-plate stresses were transmitted into the Variscan foreland resulting in extensive deformation. In the East Midlands area, uplift and folding of the hanging walls of the main extensional fault trends created the principal traps (Fraser & Gawthorpe). Elsewhere, in the Silverpit area of the Southern North Sea, gas accumulations in Carboniferous reservoirs are also located in areas of Variscan inversion. Subsequently, during the latest Carboniferous-early Permian,
