Animal Entanglements Erika Cudworth,2024-04-01 This book provides an insight into the everyday lives and experiences of people who live with dogs as companions and glimpses aspects of the lives of the dogs who share their homes It is framed sociologically and as such considers the various forms of power relations which shape the lives of those kept as pets and their human owners In recounting stories of companion humans and dogs the co constituted quality of life is clear However while dogs as agential beings with needs desires and a point of view are able to shape outcomes and change aspects of their lived experience the world they inhabit is profoundly geared to human inhabitants and the most privileged ones at that The book revisits the notion of pet keeping as the interplay between domination and affection arguing that these do not exist as a continuum but a mesh of complex relations played out in the use of homespace in the kitchen the bedroom the in the public world of park and the street Those living with dog companions as well as the dogs themselves find their lives are muddled both literally and figuratively boundaries are tested and recast and the complications of inter species cohabitation negotiated by all parties Through an innovative theoretical contribution Cudworth conceptualizes human relations with companion dogs in terms of complex social relations that involve both systemic forms of domination as well as nonhuman agency in shaping social relations and social forms Humans in an Animal's World - How Non-Human Animals Perceive and Interact with Humans Christian Nawroth,Luigi Baciadonna,Nathan J.
