

Looking into tomorrow Health workforce issues confronting physician assistants

Richard W. Dehn, MPA, PA-C; James F. Cawley, PA-C, MPH

An important contemporary issue facing the physician assistant (PA) profession is how the supply of, and demand for, these clinicians will be balanced in America's health care marketplace. Recently, debate and discussion has occurred within the profession regarding the implications and outcomes of the recent expansion of the supply of PAs, taking the form of a question: What does increasing the supply of PAs mean for their future demand and utilization?

Not long ago, it was assumed that the growth potential of the PA profession was strong—a belief that helped justify establishment of a number of new PA programs and expansion of enrollment in existing programs. Between 1994 and 1999, expansion of the PA educational sector was significant (see Table 1, page 30).

As the number of PA graduates has

Mr. Dehn is assistant director of the physician assistant program and clinical professor at the University of Iowa College of Medicine, Iowa City. He is a member of the editorial board of JAAPA. Mr. Cawley is professor of health care sciences and director of the physician assistant/master of public health program in the School of Medicine and Health Sciences and professor of prevention and community health in the School of Public Health and Health Services, The George Washington University, Washington, DC. He is the editor of "Book Review" in JAAPA.

ABSTRACT

An important issue facing the physician assistant (PA) profession is how it can achieve a balance between supply of, and demand for, the services that PAs provide in the health workforce of the future. Recently, there has been debate and discussion about the implications of the recent expansion of the supply of PAs. In this article, we review and discuss (1) workforce data on physicians, PAs, and nurse practitioners and (2) projections of the number of these clinicians who will be trained in the future. We then analyze (1) data that describe the past 11 years of PA education and (2) data that address the experience of recent graduates of PA education programs who have sought employment. Some evidence suggests that, although demand has kept pace with expanding supply, a perception clearly exists that the PA job market may be tightening in some regions of the United States.

increased steadily, questions have been raised about the effect of this increase in the health workforce of the future. Some argue that the sharp increase in annual PA graduates, coupled with similar increases in other health professions recently, could soon outstrip demand and prompt an oversupply. A shortage of jobs for PAs could result in underemployment and market saturation.^{1,2}

Conversely, others contend that an increase in the supply of PAs was necessary to ensure that adequate numbers were available to meet rising demand; these commentators noted that, were PAs not readily available, other non-
