Smoking behavior is associated with suicidality in individuals with psychosis and bipolar disorder: a systematic quantitative review and meta-analysis

Smoking behavior has been well-established to be more prevalent in individuals with psychosis and bipolar disorder compared to the general population. However, reports about higher suicide attempt prevalence of smoking compared to non-smoking patients suggest that smoking behavior may contribute to identifying at-risk groups of patients in a comparatively easy manner. In the present systematic quantitative review, we provide meta-analytical evidence on the smoking and suicide attempt link in 22 studies ($k = 27$ independent samples; $N = 11,452$) of patients with psychosis and bipolar disorder. We observed a small meaningful effect of smoking on suicide attempts ($OR = 1.70$; 95% CI [1.48; 1.95]), indicating that smokers have 1.70 the odds of having reported a suicide attempt compared to non-smokers. This effect generalized across diagnosis type (i.e., schizophrenia vs. bipolar spectrum disorder), sample type (i.e., in- vs. outpatients), and participant sex. However, the observed summary effect appeared somewhat inflated due to publication process-related mechanisms, showing some evidence for effect-inflating publication bias and a decline effect. In all, the presently observed smoking and suicide attempt link appears to be small but meaningful and robust, thus suggesting smoking status represents a useful variable for the identification of at-risk populations for suicide attempts.

1 Introduction

It has been well-established that people who have been diagnosed with mental illnesses have elevated smoking rates (Hart et al., 2014). For instance, psychotic patients have been reported to show a smoking prevalence that is more than twice as large compared to that of the general population (Dickerson et al., 2013). However, individuals with psychosis are not only more likely to smoke but also to consume more, stronger, and often unfiltered cigarettes (and therefore more laden with nicotine and tar) (De Souza et al., 2012). Moreover, they have been reported to have more difficulty quitting than other individuals (Haukestein et al., 2002).

Several candidate theories have been proposed that may explain the smoking prevalence differences between healthy adults and individuals diagnosed with psychosis and bipolar disorder. Arguably, the most prominent theory is currently the self-medication theory (Leimu
