Revolutions are a venerable subject of several social science disciplines. As with almost every subject, explanations abound. Revolutions have been attributed to feelings of relative deprivation (Gurr 1970), to the structural breakdown of states and antagonism of elites (Skocpol 1979; Goldstone 1991), and to the mobilization of popular groups against the government (Johnson 1966; Smelser 1963; Huntington 1964; Tilly 1978). Several authors have also pointed to the special vulnerability to revolutions of autocratic, personalist states (Dix 1984; Goldstone 1986; Goodwin and Skocpol 1989; Shugart 1989; Farhi 1990; Wickham-Crowley 1991; McDaniel 1991). However, common to virtually all of these writers is a focus on macrosocial, rather than individual-level, conditions leading to revolution.

In view of the theoretical paradigm advanced in this journal, efforts to use rational choice theory to clarify the conditions of revolutionary mobilization and success are of particular interest. So far, the explanation of revolutions has not been a primary focus of rational choice theorists. The classic work of Tullock (1971) is still the primary starting point, while the well-known case study of Vietnam by Popkin (1979) remains the outstanding empirical study of revolutionary mobilization using a rational choice explanatory framework. Tullock's work pointed out that the free rider problem militates against an individual's participation in revolutions. Popkin showed how selective incentives and sanctions had to be used by revolutionary entrepreneurs to mobilize individualist peasants against village elites. Succeeding work, such as the collection of essays edited by Taylor (1988), has continued
