Background: Social transition is one of the multi-level mechanisms that influence health disparities. However, it has received less attention as one of the non-traditional social determinants of health. A few studies have examined China's social transition and its impact on health inequality in self-rated health (SRH). Therefore, this study explores the impact of China's market-oriented reforms—social transition and socioeconomic status (SES)—on residents' SRH.

Methods: Using the cross-sectional data from the Chinese General Social Survey (CGSS) in 2017, we analyzed the effects of social transition and SES on the SRH of Chinese residents using the RIF (Recentered influence function) method. The RIF decomposition method investigated health differences among different populations and their determinants.

Results: Social transition and SES have significant positive effects on the SRH of Chinese residents. The correlation between SES and the SRH of Chinese residents is moderated by social transition, implying that social transition can weaken the correlation between SES and the SRH of Chinese residents. The impacts of SES and social transition on SRH vary across populations.

Conclusion: Promoting social transition and favoring disadvantaged groups with more resources are urgently needed to promote equitable health outcomes.

1 Introduction

Health inequalities are systematic, avoidable, and unfair differences in health outcomes observed between populations, social groups within the same population, or as a gradient across a population ranked by social position (1). Health inequalities within populations are caused by underlying structural inequalities in society. These structural inequalities produce unequal health outcomes through various socioeconomic pathways, including employment, income, housing, and educational attainment (2). Ensuring equitable access to healthcare services and support is essential for addressing health inequalities.
