

CONCLUSIONS

The results of the present study show that the use of a single, low-dose, intranasal spray of a live attenuated influenza vaccine (LAIV) is sufficient to induce a protective immune response in healthy adults. The immune response was measured by the presence of specific IgG and IgA antibodies, and by the presence of virus-specific T cells. The results show that the immune response was sustained for at least 12 months after vaccination. The results also show that the immune response was not significantly different between the two groups of subjects. These results suggest that a single, low-dose, intranasal spray of a live attenuated influenza vaccine (LAIV) is sufficient to induce a protective immune response in healthy adults.
