McMaster University, Volume 2 Charles M. Johnston, 2015-09-01 McMaster University was established in 1887 as a trust to the Baptist constituency of central Canada This second volume of the university's history chronicles its transformation from a modest university college into an important university It is the story of survival through the Depression and the Second World War to eventual emergence as a recognized scientific research centre and of how this role never envisaged at the time when arts and theology were McMaster's chief concerns dictated the university's divorce from its original Baptist sponsors McMaster's move to Hamilton in 1930 coincided with the Depression a catastrophe that haunted the university throughout the decade thwarting new programs forcing economies and shattering the hopes entertained for the institution during the 1920s This chastening interlude was followed by war which further curbed development and created serious financial and enrolment problems but the war also spurred scientific research particularly in nuclear physics Funds for science were sought outside the Baptist constituency but to be eligible for them a new and separate institution had to be formed so in 1948 Hamilton College was incorporated and affiliated with McMaster Members of the arts faculty were disturbed by the growing stress on science and the university's attempts to strengthen arts and theology in the 1950s so threatened to overtax its resources that McMaster was forced to seek state aid for its entire operation In 1957 McMaster was reorganized as a private non denominational institution eligible for public funding Its days as a Baptist university came to an end Charles Johnston pays tribute to those dedicated and resourceful administrators who through depression war and ideological conflicts provided the expertise essential to the survival and growth of McMaster This volume like its predecessor and successor will be of interest to anyone concerned with the cultural and intellectual growth of the nation Technical News Bulletin of the National Bureau of Standards ,1967 New York Weekly Review ,1861 Public Opinion ,1896
