

THE PATHOLOGY OF RUBELLA DEAFNESS

By JOHN LINDSAY (Chicago) and R. SPENCER HARRISON (Lincoln)

THE artificial production of foetal abnormalities in chicks or tadpoles appeared to be of little interest clinically until 1941 when Gregg described work on the association of foetal defects with maternal rubella. Since that time more clinical work and an extension of mammalian observations have led to a great increase of interest in a subject which can now be seen to have great potentialities.

It is recognized that above all the timing of the interference is the vital factor. The same type of abnormality is producible by several methods experimentally provided they are applied at the same developmental stage and it thus appears that for each part of the body there is a time, its critical developmental period, at which it would be selectively affected by any one of many methods though in varied degree. Other virus diseases such as influenza, mumps, poliomyelitis and infectious hepatitis also produce foetal changes, toxoplasmosis appears to produce changes chiefly in the eye and brain and 60-80 per cent. of the children thus affected are mentally retarded. The precise nature of the agent would thus be of less importance than the timing and magnitude of the interference. For instance anoxia affects tissues which at the time of exposure are rapidly differentiating and therefore have a high metabolism and so a high oxygen need.

In the first six weeks of pregnancy damage may occur to many organs including the eyes and ears, but later than this the eye and the vestibular system are spared. Between the sixth and twelfth week of pregnancy the inner ear appears to be more easily damaged (Murray, 1949). The organ of Corti is not completely developed until after the end of the fifth month, though from the commencement of the second trimester the foetus needs chiefly to mature and grow and teratogenic noxae no longer are effective. It should be noted that the effect is confined to organs of ectodermal origin. Almost, if not absolutely, identical histological appearances in the ear result from damage in early infancy from conditions such as measles, mumps or poliomyelitis.

If the usual five-yearly cycle of small rubella epidemics fails to occur, an increase in the incidence of rubella embryopathy may be seen during a more major epidemic as happened in Australia.

The percentage of cases of infantile deafness accounted for by rubella is variable. Goodhill (1950) found that it was responsible for 20·5 per cent. of 904 deaf children as against 3 per cent. caused by erythroblastosis and 10 per cent. by meningitis. A maternal rubella history was given in 35 per
