

This study evaluates the seriousness of communication barriers for the following five teaching methods: (1) straight lecture, (2) prepared case studies, (3) experiential exercises, (4) computer simulation, and (5) "live" case studies. The results of this study indicate the presence of 13 communications barrier clusters or factors that concern students. A number of significant differences exist for six of the clusters among the five teaching methods.

An Analysis of Communication Barriers in Five Methods of Teaching Business Subjects

Steven Golen and Alvin C. Burns

Louisiana State University

James W. Gentry

Oklahoma State University

AS EDUCATORS, WE WISH TO TRANSMIT information to our students in the most effective and efficient manner. The methods we use to complete this process are unique to each instructor. However, it seems reasonable to assume that five specific methods are common in the classroom today. These five methods are: straight lecture, prepared case studies of varying length and complexity, experiential exercises (i.e., workbook, end-of-chapter problems), computer simulation, and "live" case studies where students work on problems in business and industry.

Which method is the best? Why does one instructor use one method over another? Why is one method successful for one instructor but unsuccessful for another? From our observations, it seems that the method chosen is basically a function of each instructor's own experiences as a student, personal preferences, unfamiliarity with other methods, departmental expectations, and perhaps peer or mentor influence.

Therefore, many questions exist regarding the relative merits and potential problem areas when an instructor considers an alternative teaching method for his or her course. What can an instructor expect in terms of the students' achievement and their attitudes toward the subject matter, the course, the other students, and the instructor? Since learning is the result of a communication process, problems or barriers can inhibit or restrict this process, affect learning, and influence students' attitudes. This process, or in this case the particular teaching method selected by the instructor, will likely produce certain communication barriers peculiar to the method.

PURPOSE

The purpose of this study was five-fold. Specifically, we sought to:

1. investigate the seriousness of communication barriers for each method;
2. determine whether certain barriers are unique or cluster with other barriers;
3. determine the differences in perceived seriousness of the barriers for each method;
4. determine the differences in perceived seriousness of the various barriers for four basic business disciplines; and
