

more satisfied in group participation when they believe that their opinions are valued (Anderson & Martin, 1995).

Cohorts as Groups

With more educational organizations embracing cohorts as basic building blocks of their programs, cohorts, with structured interactive experiences, advance a group sense of affiliation, motivation, and coordination of efforts (Young & Brewer, 2008). Group development in cohorts is characterized by "interaction (which results in cohesiveness among group members), purpose (which promotes collaboration), and interdependence (which represents the hallmark of a group's readiness)" (Nooris & Barnett, 1994, p. 32). Through group experiences, students in cohorts develop increased empowerment, collegiality, affiliation, support, community, and trust (Barnett et al., 2000).

The functionality and productivity of cohorts are the consequence of group processes or group dynamics. A comprehensive study of group dynamics is essential to understanding the contributions of cohorts to students' persistence and academic performance in educational leadership programs. Previously, the literature exploring cohorts has examined structural arrangements of cohorts and the impact of cohorts on students. Ultimately, however, educational leadership faculty must be concerned with the group dynamics that are most likely to hinder or contribute to the overall positive effects of the cohort experience. Moreover, research findings report generally positive effects of cohort arrangements, but rarely make direct comparisons to non-cohort groups. The purpose of this study is to examine whether there are any differences on characteristics of group dynamics such as participation, communication, collaboration, influence, trust, cohesion, empowerment, and satisfaction between cohort and non-cohort students in an educational leadership preparation program.

Method

Sample

Purposive sampling was used to gain insight and understanding from a sample that could be particularly informative (Cresswell, 2006). The participants in the study were students enrolled in master's degree courses in the educational leadership preparation program offered at a large metropolitan state university located in the southeastern United States. At the time of the study, the educational leadership department incorporated both a closed cohort groups of students who took all of their courses together in a prearranged sequence and a non-cohort groups with students who enrolled in courses and completed the program on an individual basis. The program was the same for both cohort and non-cohort students.

The sample consisted of educational leadership students enrolled in one of five courses identified as cohort-only or open enrollment. From these five courses, two had only graduate students admitted to one of two cohorts ($n=63$) and three were open
