

Writing for publication

Terry Hanley & Edith Steffen

WHILST AT this year's Division of Counselling Psychology Conference in Leicester, I (Terry) was asked numerous questions about the process of publishing in Counselling Psychology Review. In fact throughout the year I regularly field questions about the publishing process more generally. In being transparent I should acknowledge that I myself am relatively new to the publishing game and in becoming Editor of this publication I found myself splashing in the deep end of rather choppy waters. In this editorial, therefore, I hope to share some of my experiences of getting into print with the hope that doing so proves useful to others. To harness this discussion I adopt a relatively standard chronological presentation, outlining some of the considerations/thoughts I have had at different stages of getting into print. I also present 10 tips to help you along the way. I am then accompanied on the final leg of the journey by Edith Steffen, who has kindly agreed to act as a case example and thus providing a vehicle to bring some of my more turgid presentation alive. Following this, an overview of the rest of this edition of Counselling Psychology Review is given.

Choosing an outlet

There are so many publishing options these days that you will have to sit down and ponder what fits with your hopes for the work you are thinking about creating. You may want to write something relatively informal for a professional audience or you might want to write something for a hard nosed research journal. Such a decision may be led by your personal interests or professional roles – for instance, those embedded in practice may see practitioner journals and books as being a more natural home for their work, whilst those with roles in academia may see research journals as a necessary part of their job. It is publishing within the latter type of publication that the rest of this paper will discuss (with the process of publishing within Counselling Psychology Review being an unashamed focal point).

Tip 1: Consider submitting your work to Counselling Psychology Review – please.

Writing the paper

There is obviously a lot to think about when sitting down to write a paper for publication. First things first, however, you do not want to fall at the first hurdle and you must write your paper with the publication's 'house style' in mind. For instance, numerous papers are submitted to Counselling Psychology Review that are either referenced using a different format or do not have an abstract. I like to think that we, involved in editing Counselling Psychology Review, are responsive to the developmental process that such errors indicate but others are not and will send the paper straight back to you without looking beyond such surface issues. For information, although publications often provide an overview of their expectations on a website, the best way to get a grasp of a house style is to read a few papers from the publication itself.

In relation to the house styles that publications have, it is also useful to consider the topic that you are presenting. Particularly publications often have their own scope and interests. For example, many publications do not publish theory papers, and solely look to publish empirical research. As is evident from the pages in this particular edition, Counselling Psychology Review aims to straddle
