

feature of CBT is that it can be used in conjunction with a video disk for instantaneous access to a multimedia data base (e.g., photos, audio, scenarios).

As the microcomputer becomes more technologically advanced with multi-user capacity, hard-disk-on-board, faster chips, and more memory, interactive video disk becomes a reality for training. The key hardware component in realizing interactive video is the newly developed optical disk. Similar in nature to the popular compact disk, the optical video disk can store large amounts of information. (You can store an entire encyclopedia on one side of a 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ -inch optical disk.) Optical storage provides users instant access to large data bases by storing blocks of text or visual images in frames. The laser-read system can access each frame quickly and precisely. With appropriate software and hardware, the laser system can be coupled with a microcomputer for interactive video.

Currently most interactive video is found in the corporate training centers and in the military. McDonnell Douglas uses interactive video for training and production. For example, in a training system developed for the F-15 fighter plane, pilots can experience simulations of engine failure utilizing a video disk. Maintenance personnel, on the other hand, can learn to repair the plane with the system evaluating the results of their work. The company claims that interactive video disk training is safer and less expensive than field training. McDonnell Douglas is also experimenting with interactive video for visual storage of technical drawing and reference materials for on-board-display ("Computer-Based Training," 1987) to assist pilots and technical personnel in flight. Another company that utilized video disk for training is the Wilson Learning Corporation. This group is using the video disk to teach strategies, concepts, and management principles. As the software becomes more flexible and the hardware becomes less expensive, we should experience an increase in video disk use for training.

Computer-based training can take many forms. One popular form of CBT is that of Computer-managed Instruction (CMI). In CMI the computer is used to manage the instructional resources (media, simulators, classrooms) and the student's progress. The CMI system coordinates all teaching and testing activities while keeping track of student records. The system monitors the student's progress to make adjustments, identifying students who may be in danger of failing and, similarly, those who are likely to succeed.

A number of industries presently make use of CBT to train their employees. American Airlines uses a CBT to train its flight crews. American Airlines claims to have reduced training time by 50% with savings of approximately $30 million per year in fuel costs (Kearsley, 1983). Other airlines also utilize CBT to train crews. The IBM corporation uses CBT to train field engineering staff (Branscomb, 1983). Banks and insurance companies also use CBT. Aetna Life and Casualty uses CBT to train personnel in mathematics (Lowe, 1979). The largest users of CBT, however, are the armed services. The Navy, for example, uses CBT to manage the daily instruction of thousands of students, in a number of courses, at nine schools (Davis, 1978).
