

INTRODUCTION

Artificial prosthetic limbs are an essential option for patients who cannot feel. However, an upper limb is a complex structure that is not only a source of movement but also a source of sensory information. The most common type of prosthetic limb is a myoelectric prosthesis, which uses electrical signals from the user's muscles to control the movement of the limb. However, these devices are often bulky and expensive, and they do not provide the same level of dexterity and tactile feedback as a natural limb.

However, the lack of tactile feedback is a major limitation for many users. Without this feedback, it is difficult to control the force and position of the limb, which can lead to injury or damage to the limb. To address this issue, researchers are developing new types of prosthetic limbs that provide tactile feedback. One approach is to use a sensor array to detect the position and force of the limb, and then use this information to control the movement of the limb. Another approach is to use a haptic interface to provide tactile feedback to the user.

AI technology is becoming more accessible because of a new type of actuator

Researchers at the MIT CSAIL and MIT Media Lab have developed a new type of actuator that is more accessible than traditional actuators. This new actuator is based on a soft, flexible material that can be controlled by a small amount of electrical current. The actuator is designed to be used in a variety of applications, including prosthetics, robotics, and human-machine interfaces.
