

Security with External Language Routines

- To deal with security problems, we can do one of the following:
 - Use sandbox techniques
 - That is, use a safe language like Java, which cannot be used to access/damage other parts of the database code.
 - Run external language functions/procedures in a separate process, with no access to the database process' memory.
 - Parameters and results communicated via inter-process communication
- Both have performance overheads
- Many database systems support both above approaches as well as direct executing in database system address space.
