

FROM THE BOOK

On July 25, 1944, Jack Capell was serving with the 8th Infantry Regiment of the 4th Division: "The St. Lô breakout — Cobra — began when 3,000 US bombers started to blast a path through the German defenses. Visibility was bad that day and some bombs fell on our positions. My regiment was spearhead for the attack and the next day, when 2,700 bombers came over, we caught most of it. First there was this tremendous, earth-shaking sound, the roar of thousands of engines. The dive-bombers hit the German defenses to our front, right on time and right on target, and I thought we were doing pretty well. Then came the B17s . . .

From then on it was indescribable. The whole earth was shaking, the air was full of dust and smoke and bits of steel and lumps of earth, and the roar of engines went on and on over my head. We had about 600 casualties, with over 100 killed. The ground ahead looked like the surface of the moon but our 'B' company attacked anyway and we all followed."

By the end of February 1945, with most of the Western armies on the Rhine and Patton forging up the Moselle valley, Nazi Germany was clearly in extremis. With the last natural defense line threatened, desperate measures were necessary to defend the remnants of the Reich, and even schoolboys were now recruited into the ranks of the Volkssturm. One of these was Fred Rhambo: "We got no news on the German radio . . . So, we trained and waited, and the bombers came over by day and night. Then we heard the guns . . . I was a 15-year-old with 12 young kids under me, and we waited for the British tanks."
