

IN THE ARCHIVE

Circulation, Exchange, and the Penal Press

JOSHUA A. MITCHELL

ABSTRACT: In the mid-twentieth century, newspapers were published at nearly every prison in North America. These papers were written, edited, illustrated, and printed by imprisoned staffs, and they were exchanged between editors for journalistic peer review through a network they called the Penal Press. This article describes the methods of production, reception, and most of all distribution of these Penal Press papers, focusing on the practice of trading prison papers across great distances between readers at faraway institutions. It insists that to properly understand the Penal Press, its periodicals must be studied as a collection. The necessity of understanding the Penal Press in this way, however, is circumscribed by the fact that these papers have had no central depository and are scattered in numerous archives across the continent. As Reveal Digital's newly launched American Prison Newspapers database continues to add digitized versions of prison periodicals to its online collection, there is greater hope that a fuller history of the Penal Press will be possible.

KEYWORDS: circulation, exchange, Penal Press, prisons, race

Imprisoned authors in North America have written, curated, and circulated writings in newspaper, newsletter, or zine format since the nineteenth century. During a window of time in the mid-twentieth century, this practice developed into a unique interprison franchise in which prison journalists could exchange their papers with peers at other institutions. The exchange of prison publications allowed imprisoned journalists to read, cite, republish, and plagiarize each other's stories, forming a rich dialogue far beyond the boundaries of a single carceral site. Journalists writing for the Candle at Wisconsin State Prison, for instance, read and
