Volume 1 Alfred Joshua Butler, 2013-09 This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book without typos from the publisher Not indexed Not illustrated 1884 edition Excerpt M in the wall inside also plainly marks the position Whether there was even a north aisle door is very doubtful Outside there are no signs of it inside the floor has been raised more than three feet above the nave floor and though I N PART OF CHOIR OR TRANSEPT there is a recess in the wall which might have been saved in blocking a doorway there is not evidence enough to decide the question I think however that a comparison of the plan with that of the White Monastery near Suhag in Upper Egypt will settle the fact that the western apsidal chamber in the one case as in the other was either a chapel or a baptistery and the probabilities are very largely in favour of the former In the plan of the White Monastery a north aisle door is simply impossible to imagine and there is definite evidence for the altar in this part of the narthex Similarly it is almost indisputable that the apsidal chamber at Abu Sargah was anciently a chapel and that the original entrance to it was southward from the central part of the narthex and not westward from the street It was doubtless this chapel into which the newly baptised were taken to receive their first communion The general shape of the church is or was a nearly regular oblong and its general structure is basilican It consists of narthex nave north and south aisle choir and three altars eastward each in its own chapel of these the central and southern chapels are apsidal the northern is square ended On plan Abu Sargah much resembles a type common among the Syrian churches of the sixth and seventh centuries such as that of Kalb Luzah Turmanin or Al Barah¹ but these Syrian churches differ from the Coptic in being built of hewn stone with windows and wide arches and above The Ancient coptic churches of Egypt Alfred J.
