Not That You Asked Mark Randall, 2001-05-29 Collected writings on booze smoking society education art and various other things on the decline by the irreverent provocative and occasionally witty Philadelphia columnist Excerpts from Mark Randall's Not That You Asked On smoking it is a shame we are content with this tedious non-debate about which is better virtue or vice instead of the really more interesting topic namely the relative virtues to be found among the available vices On identity politics proponents of identity politics are not really offended by racial inferences they would only prefer that all of the inferences be complimentary On city living Look upon your stolen wreaths as a kind of donation to the poor and you see that what you lose in Hope you gain in Charity In fact since Charity is regarded as the greatest of virtues you may flatter yourself to be exchanging your Hope at a profit On religion anti-Papism is one of those activities that's probably best left to Catholics On the French I have always tried to defend the French against the usual criticisms but it is difficult work hampered right at the outset by the fact that most of the usual criticisms are true On his own problems But how do I reconcile a life that fades out with me typing alone in the basement instead of on a terrace in Majorca on the phone to a producer occasionally waving down to Francesca who is sunning herself nude on the pier
