

The Apricot Tree: a True Story

It was a large apricot tree with a cement-patched stump on one side, and a green canopy of limbs that draped over her back porch, giving shade and sustenance to my Grandmother. It was her tree, old and gnarled, but always giving sweet perfect fruit each summer, as long as I could remember.

"That's probably the last crop" she'd always say. "The fruit is too heavy, and the limbs are too hollow to last another year."

But still it faithfully bloomed and bore, giving her countless jars of jam, tasty cobblers and pies, and all we could eat of the sweet, pink-blushed bounty. Her apricot tree never disappointed, and neither did she. We never walked away in winter without a jar of her incredible preserves.

One summer day, when Grandma was ninety-six, she fell, and they took her from her home, never to return. The tree sensed something was wrong when Grandma failed to pick the morning's fruit, and with a mighty heave, it cracked loudly, and fell to the ground in a tremendous thud, as though it had been struck by unseen lightning. The blue jays were dumbfounded.

But I knew why it fell. That tree was as old as Grandma. They had sustained each other for so long. Neither could have lived happily without the other. It was fitting that the young couple who bought her house vowed to plant another apricot tree, in the exact same place, in Grandma's honor. They would have it no other way.

I wished them well, knowing it was the perfect spot.

August morning . . .
the sapling's shade
touches the house
