"Was it an interesting funeral?"

Father Bob Koesler stubbed out his third afterdinner cigarette. Dinners at old St. Ursula's rectory were painfully elongated experiences for Koesler for the simple reason that he tore through his food like a starving European child, while Father Paul Pompilio, pastor at St. Ursula's, toyed with his.

Father Pompilio carefully cut a sliver of meat from his porterhouse, placed the knife beside his plate, transferred the fork from his left hand to his right, and began to swirl the meat in its juice. "Not particularly. You've seen one priest's funeral, you've seen 'em all."

Koesler lit another cigarette. There were a million places he'd rather be, but, for politeness' sake, he always waited until Pompilio finished eating. Which was always a good forty-five minutes after Koesler finished. Which was not helping Koesler's effort to cut down on cigarettes.

"Was Monsignor O'Brien there?"

Pompilio's fork and knife were resting on his plate as he thoughtfully chewed a morsel of steak. "Old O'Brien? It wouldn't have been a valid priest's funeral without O'Brien. He was there, all right, from the first psalm of the Office for the Dead until they wheeled the body out the door. They were great buddies, you know." Pompilio resumed knife and fork and began sawing away at another cut of meat. "Old Father Larry Lord and O'Brien. Funny thing. Before they closed the lid on the casket, O'Brien tried on Lord's glasses—took them right off the old man's face and tried 'em on. Looked around the church, decided his own were better, put the glasses back on Lord, and went back to his pew like nothing happened. It's a good thing O'Brien didn't need teeth."

Koesler's stomach turned. He was glad he'd finished eating. Pompilio built a forkful of mashed potatoes.

"How was the sermon?" Koesler asked, crushing out his fourth afterdinner cigarette. He had tried early on to monopolize dinner
