The Art Fair Effect Fabiola Tosi, 2017 The contemporary art market is shifting away from its traditional gallery model to an event driven system where art fairs are slowly taking over Not only fairs are a mirror of the market's trends but they impact the ecology of the cities where they develop Acting as patron of a city's vitality each art fair engages in a complex network of relationships with civic cultural and business partners Although positive in relation to an increasingly globalized industry this shift in the market's economic focal point is not without its challenges Art fairs create a global and transcultural structure where collectors can encounter non local artists yet fair fatigue has developed due to costs and stress afflicting dealers The following research paper based on case studies of EXPO CHICAGO and miart Milan compares the complexity of these two art environments of similar cultural vitality but different market volumes The goal is to interrogate the sustainability of the art fair model through the definition of a model for impact measurement contributing to long term legitimization of art fairs as part of a city's cultural development The actuality of a positive impact would demonstrate the importance of art fairs as market leaders and important contributors to the discourse around contemporary art Fairland

Stefano Baia Curioni, 2014 How do we imagine the art fair of the future Alongside the recurrent question of the relationship between fairs and biennials and the debate on the cultural or purely commercial role of these events with their high concentration of symbolic social and financial capital Fairland wants to explore the phenomenon of fairization Fairland is a wide ranging collection of analytical standpoints and possible visions by outstanding artists curators and critics
