The Outcasts Maksim Gorky,1902 The OUTCASTS and OTHER STORIES by MAXIM GORKY Maksim Gorky,2017-11-10

The High Street consists of two rows of one storeyed hovels squeezed close one against another old hovels with leaning walls and crooked windows with dilapidated roofs disfigured by time patched with shingles and overgrown with moss here and there above them rise tall poles surmounted with starling houses whilst the roofs are shaded by the dusty green of pollard willows and elder bushes the sole miserable vegetation of suburbs where dwell the poorest classes The windows of these hovels their glass stained green with age seem to watch each other with the shifty cowardly glance of thieves Up the middle of the street crawls a winding channel passing between deep holes washed out by the heavy rain here and there lie heaps of old broken bricks and stones overgrown with weeds the remains of the various attempts made from time to time by the inhabitants to build dwellings but these attempts have been rendered useless by the torrents of stormwater sweeping down from the town above On the hill nestle amongst the luxuriant green of gardens magnificent stone built houses the steeples of churches rise proudly towards the blue heavens their golden crosses glittering in the sun In wet weather the town pours into this outlying suburb all its surface water and in the dry weather all its dust and this miserable row of hovels has the appearance of having been swept down at one of these moments by some powerful hand Crushed into the ground these half rotten human shelters seem to cover all the hill whilst stained by the sun by the dust and by the rains they take on them the dirty nondescript colour of old decaying wood At the end of this miserable street stood an old long two storeyed house which seemed to have been cast out in this way from the town and which had been bought by the merchant Petounnikoff This was the last house in the row standing just under the hill and stretching beyond it were fields ending at a distance of half a verst from the house in an abrupt fall towards the river This large and very old house had a more sinister aspect than its neighbours all its walls were crooked and in its rows of windows there was not one that had preserved its regular form whilst the remnants of the window panes were of the dirty green colour of stagnant water The spaces between the windows were disfigured with discoloured patches of fallen plaster as if time had written the history of the house in these hieroglyphics Its roof sagging forwards towards the street increased its pathetic aspect it seemed as if the house were bowing itself towards the ground and were humbly waiting for the last stroke of fate to crumble it into dust or into a deformed heap of half rotten ruins The front gates were ajar One side torn from its hinges lay on the ground and from the cracks between the boards sprang grass which also covered the great desolate yard At the farther end of this yard stood a low smoke blackened shed with an iron roof The house itself was uninhabited but in this mean shed which had been a forge was installed a common lodging house or doss house kept by a retired cavalry officer Aristide Fomitch Kouvalda Inside this doss house appeared as a long dark den lighted by four square windows and a wide door The brick unplastered walls were dark with smoke which had also blackened the ceiling In the middle stood a large stove round which and along the walls were ranged wooden bunks containing bundles of rubbish which served the dossers for beds The walls reeked with smoke the earthen floor with damp and the bunks with sweat and rotten rags
