

No parent is ever prepared in advance to become the parent of a handicapped child. Parents tend to employ the same practices with their handicapped child that they use with their other children and have virtually no guidelines to assist them in assuming any specialized role in relation to the presence of a handicapped child. The manner in which a parent adapts to the role of rearing a handicapped child is the principal focus of this book.

Combining the precision of research techniques with the writing skill of a novelist, the author translates his research findings into well-defined information about the entire family structure in dynamic daily living experiences for the parents of handicapped children and for professional workers who attempt to guide these parents.
