

About the author:

XAN FIELDING was born in India in 1918, brought up in the South of France, and educated in England and Germany. A classical scholar at Charterhouse, he studied philosophy and modern languages at the universities of Bonn and Munich, then travelled in Greece and the Eastern Mediterranean until the outbreak of the War.

Commissioned in the Intelligence Corps, he volunteered for special duties and spent the next five years behind the enemy lines in Greece, France and Indo-China; but mostly in Crete, where he was awarded the D.S.O. as a 23-year-old Lieutenant.

After demobilisation he was for a short time an undergraduate at New College, Oxford; then became in quick succession an officer in the Control Commission of Germany, an assistant columnist in Fleet Street, a temporary postman in Wimpole Street, editor of a trade journal in Knightsbridge, and Information Officer to the Egyptian Embassy in London. But his main occupation during that period consisted of seeking permits for returning to Greece, which he has subsequently revisited three times since the War: firstly on the staff of the Allied Mission for Observing the Greek Elections; again as an observer for the United Nations Special Commission on the Balkans; and finally on his own in the White Mountains of Crete, where he gathered the material for this book.

He has since married the photographer whose work illustrates the present volume, and now lives in Cornwall.
