

Archaeological narratives in ethnicity studies

Archeologické příběhy ve studiu ethnicity

Guillermo S. Reher – Manuel Fernández-Götz

In order to study ethnicity through Archaeology, the first challenge is to fully understand what that form of identity is and how it works. In recent years scholars have started to overcome the 'introduction to ethnicity' syndrome — whereby recent anthropological developments are acknowledged and then disregarded when carrying out the analysis—, shedding light on new perspectives which enlighten our understanding of ethnic identity. In this paper, we not only revise these new approaches, but offer two novel case-studies: the Treveri from Late Iron Age Gaul and the Igaeditani from Roman Lusitania.

ethnicity – archaeological theory – landscapes – sanctuaries – Iron Age – Roman period

Pro studium ethnicity prostřednictvím archeologie je třeba v první řadě plně chápat, co tato forma identity je a jak funguje. V posledních letech vědci začínají překonávat syndrom „úvodu do ethnicity“ – v jehož rámci se sice hlásí k nejnovějším antropologickým poznatkům, ale ve vlastní analýze je nezohledňují – a odhalují nové perspektivy, které informují naše chápání etnické identity. V tomto článku nejen revidujeme tyto nové přístupy, ale také předložíme dvě inovativní případové studie: Treveri z pozdní doby železné v Galii a Igaeditani z římské Lusitánie.

etnicita – teorie archeologie – krajina – svatyně – doba železná – doba římská

The 'introduction to ethnicity' syndrome

100 years after Gustaf Kossinna coined his Siedlungsarchäologie as a valid method for studying the prehistory of peoples, many of his theories are still being applied (Kossinna 1911; review in Veit 1984). It would seem that, after all the bad press concerning culture-historical approaches (notwithstanding Bintliff 2008, 156), this would no longer be the case. In truth, for decades most European archaeology has been in denial, not acknowledging the lack of methodological adaptation to the theoretical developments of the field of ethnic studies. In other words, processualism and Marxism affected little the way archaeological ethnicity was studied. This is especially true in Eastern and Central European research – which combines the German tradition (Webster 2008, 20) and the on-going culture-historical paradigm stemming from Soviet archaeology (Bromley – Kozlov 1989; Curta 2001) – as well as that carried out in most of the West.

This continuity does not occur in a vacuum. Authors usually acknowledge the developments in the field of ethnic identity studies, having read and understood the conclusions drawn from the work of Hodder (1982), Shennan (1989), Jones (1997), etc. This is the 'introduction to ethnicity'-syndrome (Reher 2011), already denounced repeatedly though with other words. Jones (1997, 36) calls it 'received implicit framework' of the archaeological culture, 'a quasi-ideology free substitute' (Veit 1989, 42). This 'syndrome' can be well diagnosed: the introduction deals with the theoretical advances on ethnicity, whereas the rest
